Background:

In Switzerland, the religious landscape is evolving. As elsewhere, the proportion of certain religious communities is diminishing (Roman Catholic, Evangelical Reformed), while others are increasing (Islamic communities, but also some Christian entities), as well as the number of religiously unaffiliated residents. Article 14 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (hereafter the CRC) requires that State Parties “shall respect the right of the child to freedom of thought, conscience and religion”. This article refers to but one of an array of rights that the CRC aims at applying holistically to all children.

At the same time, the CRC states that the rights and duties of parents (and legal guardians, when applicable) shall be respected “to provide direction to the child in the exercise of his or her right in a manner consistent with the evolving capacities of the child”. In the same vein, two International Covenants (on Civil and Political Rights, art. 18; on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, art. 13) recognize the liberty of parents “to ensure the religious and moral education of their children in conformity with their own convictions”. In Germany¹ and in Austria², at 14 years old, a child may choose his/her religion autonomously, at 12 years old s/he may not be educated on religious matters against his/her wish. In Switzerland, parents ensure the religious education of their child until 16 years old. Other more restrictive European countries set the age of religious majority at 18.

At the time of the adoption and ratification of the CRC, several governments made declarations and reservations on religious grounds or influenced by religious beliefs. Art 14 was one of the articles with more reservations, and therefore, more controversial in its application and implementation.

The CRC recognizes that, from birth onwards, children enjoy all the rights set forth, of which the right to protection is extremely important. Regarding the right to participate, and therefore to choose, this right is achieved gradually until the child reaches full autonomy. Article 12 of the CRC provides that the views of the child must be given due weight in accordance with the age and maturity of the child. Hence, tensions might arise between religious education under parental guidance and the principle of the child’s right to self-determination.

Schools are most often the places where the private and public spheres of religion meet; they are at once a locus of interconnections and tensions between the family environment, the society and the institutional presence of the state. In recent years, many debates relating to religious matters have originated in schools. The following examples, drawn from situations that occurred in Switzerland, illustrate the points of tension: requests for exemptions from swimming classes, for sexual education, or more generally for religious events; requests to adapt meals served at the school canteen according to religious norms; opposition to the display of religious symbols, among others.

² Cf. §5 Bundesgesetz über die religiöse Kindererziehung 1985.

During the last years, the world has also seen the violent radicalization of children and adolescents, and their participation in groups that adhere to extreme ideologies, often fueled by incorrect interpretations of religious scriptures. Inter-religious education has proved to be critical to prevent radicalization and violent extremism, decrease fear of the other and counteract negative extreme ideologies and narratives. How can the right to education as stated in Art. 29 of the CRC that calls for the “education of the child to be directed, among others, to the preparation of the child for responsible life in a free society, in the spirit of understanding, peace, tolerance, equality of sexes, and friendship among all peoples, ethnic, national and religious groups and persons of indigenous origin”; be fully implemented by governments? How can its implementation be compatible with education in secular societies to allow learning from the religious other and for children to be able to express and share their religious identities and beliefs, in accordance to art. 29 that calls for education to respect the child's parents, his or her own cultural identity, language and values, for the national values of the country in which the child is living, the country from which he or she may originate, and for civilizations different from his or her own?

The dimension of the freedom of religion of the child, as a rights holder, is not yet sufficiently considered in national legislations. The religious rules often benevolently applied by parents, can not only limit the child's participation and contribution during his/her compulsory education, but also generate very serious consequences to his/her health, physical and psychological integrity, to his/her right to expression, and to the right to have his/her best interests be served as a primary consideration. At the same time, the total exclusion of religion from education, and of interreligious education as a way to learn from one another, can also have consequences in matters of social cohesion and affect the prevention of violence fueled by incorrect interpretations of religion.

This raises the following questions: How does one approach the issue of the child's autonomy within the context of the State's laicity when s/he belongs to a religious community whose precepts favor the harmonious development of the child? Is religious education an obstacle to the principle of equal opportunity? How can the child's self-determination be strengthened regarding his/her right to freedom of religion or belief? How do secular societies help prevent the radicalization of children and young people by fostering interreligious education? How easily reconcilable are the expectations of the secular State versus the autonomy of the child, benevolent religious education respectful of the child and his/her gradual capacity to make his/her own choices? What are the benefits for children's rights of defining the responsibilities of faith actors?

The child's freedom of religion has not drawn much examination in academic and professional circles. This international conference seeks to conduct an in-depth reflection on this complex issue in the context of an evolving religious landscape, while recognizing the child's right to exercise his/her rights autonomously in accordance to his/her age and degree of maturity.

Objectives:

The scientific event delves into a debate on a topic that is not often examined. It addresses several objectives:

- Examine the arguments on a subject that has not been analyzed in academic and professional circles;
- Strengthen the dialogue and knowledge regarding the child's freedom of religion;
- Promote awareness on children as rights-holders;
- Discuss some of the concerns and reservations made on religious-grounds to the CRC;
- Highlight best practices regarding situations of tension between the parents' right to guide the spiritual development of the child and his/her right of self-determination.
- Build on experiences and lessons learned in engaging with children who are either victims of or vulnerable to incitement to violence in the name of religion (see Beirut Declaration and its 18 commitments on "Faith for Rights", commitment XIII).
- Discuss the role of interreligious education in secular societies and its compatibility with the secular view of the State and the right to education that respect the identity of the child.

Participants:

This conference welcomes the participation of politicians at national, cantonal and municipal levels, as well as all concerned and interested professionals such as lawyers and jurists, family and youth magistrates from all relevant jurisdictions (penal, civil, protection courts, etc.), civil servants in child protection services and other agencies working with children, family mediators, psychologists, doctors, social workers, sociologists, teachers and education specialists, representatives from the civil society, the media; and of course students, especially graduate and doctoral students.

Presentations will take place in French (F), German (D) or English (E) and benefit from simultaneous interpretation in the two other languages.
